

Holding Space for the Communal Self: Identity Gaps, Meme Discourse, and the Negotiation of Fandom Identity in Digital Culture

University of the Philippines Cebu
Lahug, Cebu City, Cebu

In Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Course
Critical Perspective in Communication
(COMM10)

Submitted by:

Ates, Deryll James, C.
Bacalso, Ysabela, D.
Caroro, Mark Lawrence, B.
Corbo, Erha Marie, I.
Tello, Raynier Joshua, E.
Visoc, Ae Kimmy Lorraine, A.

Submitted to:
Mrs. Jorisse Gumanay-Nasol

December 2025

RATIONALE

The release of the double feature film adaptation of Wicked was preceded by a promotional campaign of immense scale, characterized by a ubiquitous "pink and green" aesthetic and a highly visible global press tour. However, the cultural footprint of the film extended far beyond the official marketing materials produced by Universal Pictures. Instead, the defining narrative of the Wicked press tour was constructed by "netizens," internet users who consumed, remixed, and parodied the promotional content. Viral moments, such as the earnest emotionality of the stars "holding space" for lyrics (Di Placido, 2024) or the repetitive enthusiasm of cast member Michelle Yeoh explaining her character's initials, were transformed into internet memes that dominated social media platforms. These phenomena present a compelling case for examining the intersection of celebrity public relations and digital fan culture.

To understand this discourse, one must situate it within the landscape of contemporary Digital Culture. As Boyd (2010) posits, social media platforms function as "networked publics," spaces where the boundaries between private and public interaction are collapsed, allowing audiences to perform their identities for an invisible, scalable network of peers. Within these networked publics, the role of the audience has shifted fundamentally. As Jenkins (1992) established in his concept of Participatory Culture, fans are no longer passive consumers of media; they "transform the experience of media consumption into the production of new texts, indeed of a new culture and a new community." In the digital age, this poaching manifests primarily through internet memes, which Shifman (2013) defines not merely as humor, but as complex "discursive statements" that allow individuals to take a stance and signal membership to a specific cultural group.

This practice of meme creation is not merely additive but fundamentally transformative: it allows fans to collectively author the cultural meaning of promotional events, often subverting or expanding upon the studio's intended message. The memes become sites of cultural negotiation where fan literacy and insider knowledge are performed and validated.

The Wicked press tour offers a unique locus for analyzing these dynamics because it reveals a distinct tension, or identity gap (Jung & Hecht, 2004) between the enacted identity presented by the studio and the stars (earnest, professional, and heavily curated) and the communal identity of the digital fandom (ironic, knowledgeable, and socially bonded). When netizens circulate a meme about "holding space," they are engaging in a communicative act that negotiates this gap, claiming ownership of the narrative. The tension here is not accidental but structural, arising from the differing logics of institutional promotion and participatory fandom. Where the studio's campaign seeks to manage perception and build broad appeal, fan discourse thrives on specificity, inside jokes, and communal recognition—a divergence that makes the Wicked press tour an ideal case study in digital identity formation.

Therefore, this paper aims to analyze the discourse of the Wicked press tour memes to understand how digital communities construct identity. By applying Hecht's Communication Theory of Identity (CTI), this study argues that meme production is a discursive strategy used by netizens to bridge the gap between celebrity performance and fan interpretation, ultimately forging a cohesive Communal Identity rooted in shared humor and hyper-specific digital literacy. By examining how the fans use memes to negotiate these identity gaps, this paper contributes to broader conversations in digital media studies about agency, interpretation, and community in an era of network communication. It posits that in today's media landscape, a film's cultural impact is increasingly shaped not by its marketing budget, but by the creative, discursive labor of its audiences.

THEORETICAL FRAMEWORK

The central objective of this analysis is to determine how the meme discourse surrounding the Wicked press tour functions as a communicative process for establishing a Communal Identity among netizens. To achieve this, the study employs a dual theoretical framework: The Communication Theory of Identity (CTI) (Jung & Hecht, 2004) to map the dimensions of self and group membership, and Discourse Analysis (DA) (Schneider, 2013) as the methodological approach to interpret the collective fan communication.

A. Communication Theory of Identity (CTI) and Identity Gaps

The foundation of this study rests on Hecht's Communication Theory of Identity (CTI), which posits that identity is not a singular, innate construct, but a multifaceted phenomenon that is continually formed, expressed, and negotiated through communication (Jung & Hecht, 2004). CTI divides identity into four interdependent frames: Personal, Enacted, Relational, and Communal.

The explanatory power of CTI in this analysis lies in the concept of Identity Gaps, the discrepancy or dissonance between any two or more of these four frames (Jung & Hecht, 2004). This paper focuses primarily on the Enacted-Communal Gap, where the highly curated celebrity performance (Enacted Identity) clashes with the specialized knowledge and shared emotional reality of the digital fandom (Communal Identity). The central argument is that meme production is the primary discursive strategy used by the fandom to negotiate, articulate, and attempt to resolve these Identity Gaps.

B. Discourse Analysis Methodology

The analysis of the Wicked fan discourse will be conducted systematically, following the established principles of Discourse Analysis (DA) (Schneider, 2013). This qualitative approach, incorporating thematic coding, allows the researcher to move from raw data (memes and comments) to interpretive themes concerning identity negotiation.

The specific steps for data analysis are as follows:

Figure 1. Discursive Analysis Methodology of the Paper

C. The Discursive Construction of Communal Identity

This framework is further supported by the concept of identity construction through communication. The act of sharing or creating a meme is viewed as a form of interpellation (Hall, 1985). By understanding and participating in the joke, the netizen is "hailed" into the collective group. In this context, the meme becomes a shared ritual that transforms passive media consumption into an active affirmation of Communal Identity, demonstrating that the fandom is not defined by its consumption of the film, but by its shared discourse about the film's surrounding spectacle.

ANALYSIS

I. Comments, Memes, Posts as Forms of Discourse

The contemporary digital landscape has altered how audiences engage with media texts. No longer confined to passive reception, audiences now actively produce, circulate, and negotiate meaning through participatory practices across social media platforms. In the context of the Wicked press tour, comments, memes, and posts functioned as the primary vehicles through which fans constructed collective identity and negotiated the gaps between official celebrity performances and their own communal interpretations.

As Schneider (2013) establishes, discourse analysis requires examining not merely what is said, but how meaning is constructed through language in specific social contexts. The digital artifacts produced by Wicked fans reveal how networked publics engage in identity work. These user-generated texts are also central to the Wicked cultural phenomenon representing where fandom identity is actively constructed, performed, and reinforced.

Memes, in particular, operate as what Shifman (2013) terms "discursive statements" that allow individuals to take stances and signal group membership. When a fan creates or shares a meme about Cynthia Erivo "connecting to the mothership," they are not simply making a joke, they are participating in a ritual of communal identity formation. The meme becomes a test of cultural literacy, separating those who possess the hyper-specific knowledge required to decode the reference from those who do not. This gatekeeping function is central to how digital fandoms establish boundaries and reinforce in-group solidarity.

II. Thematic Analysis and Interpretation

The following analysis adheres to Schneider's (2013) systematic methodology for conducting discourse analysis. This framework provides a rigorous structure for examining how discourse functions within specific social contexts, revealing the underlying patterns, power dynamics, and meaning-making processes embedded within communicative acts. This methodical approach ensures that interpretations remain grounded in the material evidence while extracting implications for understanding communication and identity in networked publics.

A. Establishing Context

The Wicked press tour, running August 2024 to December 2025) in support of the double feature Wicked and Wicked: For Good, utilized a traditional Hollywood framework characterized by "pink and green" branding and coordinated media appearances to market the two-part release. However, the campaign's trajectory shifted as specific promotional interactions, such as the "holding space" interview and various cast highlights, were co-opted by social media users.

Drawing on Boyd's (2010) theory of networked publics, these moments leveraged the affordances of persistence, replicability, scalability, and searchability through online social media. By decontextualizing official media, fans bypassed studio-led narratives to create "viral phenomena" that prioritized communal identity over commercial objectives. Ultimately, this transformed the press tour from a controlled marketing exercise into a decentralized site of fan-driven discourse.

B. The Production Process

The production of Wicked press tour discourse emerged from a mix of technological affordances, platform-specific conventions, and subcultural norms within digital fan communities. Understanding how and why fans created these artifacts requires examining both the individual motivations and the collective dynamics that shaped discourse production.

Fans engaged in what Jenkins (1992) terms "textual poaching," appropriating official promotional materials and repurposing them to serve fan interests rather than studio objectives. This poaching was facilitated by the accessibility of press tour content: interviews, red carpet footage, and behind-the-scenes material were widely available across platforms, providing abundant source material for remixing and reinterpretation. TikTok's duet and stitch features, X's quote-retweet functionality, and Instagram's remix tools provided the technological infrastructure for this appropriation.

The motivations driving discourse production were multiple and overlapping. Some fans created content to demonstrate their cultural capital within fan communities, their ability to identify obscure references, or articulate shared sentiments with Wicked-particular vocabulary and lexicon. Others participated in discourse production as a form of social bonding, using memes and posts as a mode of communication that reinforced group membership rather than conveying substantive information. Still others engaged in creative expression, treating the press tour as raw material for artistic or comedic projects that existed independently of the original source material.

Platform-specific norms shaped how discourse was produced and circulated. TikTok privileged short-form video content with rapid cuts, text overlays, and trending audio clips, leading fans to create compilations of press tour moments set to music or presented with ironic commentary such as Cynthia Erivo's concept memes. X favored concise textual observations and screenshot compilations that could be rapidly consumed and shared.

C. Material Preparation

For this analysis, discourse was collected from four primary platforms: TikTok, X, Instagram and Letterboxd. These platforms were selected based on their prominence in Wicked fan discourse and their distinct communicative affordances that shaped how fans constructed and performed identity.

TikTok emerged as the most active site of discourse production, with the platform's algorithm-driven "For You" page ensuring rapid circulation of content within fan communities. The same algorithm-driven approach also applies to Instagram reels. X functioned as a hub for real-time commentary and rapid-fire discourse exchange. The platform's threading features and quote-retweet functionality enabled fans to engage in extended conversations and collaborative meaning-making. Letterboxd, while less active in terms of overall user numbers, provided a crucial site for fans to engage in more sustained and reflective discourse. The platform's review format encouraged fans to articulate their investments and interpretations with greater depth than the character limits and rapid pace of TikTok and X permitted.

Material was collected through manual observation and documentation of viral posts, trending hashtags, and recommended content across these platforms. Posts were selected based on engagement metrics (likes, shares, comments) and their representativeness of recurring themes and patterns within the discourse.

D. Coding

Following Schneider's (2013) methodology, discourse artifacts were systematically coded to identify recurring themes and patterns. The coding process identified five primary thematic codes: Diva Worship, Textual Poaching, Shipping Culture, Eroticized Fan Affection, and Cross-Platform Intertextuality.

Code	Character (User)	Dialogue/Discourse
Diva Worship	Mo ☆ Pav (@moe.pavilion) on TikTok	“She connects to the mothership every time she touches a finger on her head orb.”
	Ɔɹɹɹ_ɹɹɹ_punɹɹ (@flop_not_found1) on TikTok	“The concept of Cynthia Erivo being such a conceptual person that she created the ‘ concept of ’, because of the concept conceptualizing at the wicked promo.”
	Tim Popp, Six, Squish, Uh uh... (@popphits) on X	“Say what you want about Madame Morrible, but the woman keeps a job. She goes from a professor to press secretary to wedding officiant to weather girl and has she got news for you.”
Textual Poaching	ahri. (@trulyahri) on TikTok	“Dorothy was probably like “ain’t they supposed to be enemies?” (referring to Elphaba and Glinda singing the number ‘For Good’) itsmemcflurry (@hogwatsnerd101) on TikTok	““Yay!! I can go home now’ meanwhile my girl Glinda was grieving.”
	victor	“Dorothy: you said the yellow brick road

	(@hudevansversion) on TikTok Maeevanss (@maeevanss) on TikTok	was the quickest way when there was a bullet train glinda: yes, and?” “Dorothy in that cellar, wondering why the lady who gave her directions is singing with the wicked witch.”
Shipping Culture	it’s over (@agusthirai) on X @beltagiiii and @glowbymaryyy on Instagram lei * (@shemoonliight) on X	“Wicked brainrot so bad that every song i listen to i try to relate to gelphie [Glinda and Elphaba ship].” “When I accidentally spilled my laundry detergent on Ariana Grande and I already hear Cynthia Erivo charging my way.” “Not Glinda having to gulp bc she can’t handle the hotness of Elphaba.”
Eroticized Fan Affection	kev (@kehvuhn) on X kats on Letterboxd	“Elphaba [is] stronger than me ‘cause I would've unzipped fiyero's pants in the woods and showed Oz something truly wicked.” “The way the entire theater moaned every single time Jonathan Bailey was on screen should be studied.”
Cross-Platform Intertextuality	freakkville (@zoloftsquaddddd) on TikTok Vianna (@vianna.king) on TikTok	“Cynthia Erivo stepping in to take over Floptropican duties after Nikki [Nicki] Minaj was banned.” “It's me. So if you care to mog me, looksmaxx my alpha gyatt as Grimace told me one time everyone deserves a chance to mog!”

Table 1. Discourse Coding

This table displays the five primary thematic codes that emerged from systematic analysis of Wicked press tour discourse across digital platforms. Each code represents a distinct discursive strategy through which fans negotiated identity gaps and constructed communal belonging. The selected examples demonstrate both the diversity of fan expression and the consistent patterns that characterize each thematic category, revealing how individual creative acts participate in broader collective meaning-making processes.

E. Relevant Cultural References

The discourse surrounding Wicked drew upon multiple layers of cultural knowledge, requiring fans to possess literacy not only in the source material but also in broader internet culture, LGBTQ+ cultural history, and platform-specific communication norms.

The Diva Worship code reflects a long-standing tradition within LGBTQ+ culture of venerating female performers, particularly those associated with camp aesthetics and emotional intensity. References to Cynthia Erivo "connecting to the mothership" draw upon both science fiction imagery and the discourse of Black excellence, positioning Erivo as superhuman and other-worldly. The fixation on Michelle Yeoh's character Madame Morrible, a "villain" in the narrative and her professional versatility operates as surprising and ironic commentary on the precarity of labor in contemporary capitalism while simultaneously celebrating competence and adaptability.

Textual Poaching discourse demonstrates fans' engagement with the narrative itself, specifically the relationship between Wicked (2024), Wicked: For Good (2025), and The Wizard of Oz (1939). By inserting Dorothy as an observer of events in Wicked, fans create their versions of the story and treat them as canon events in the story while also claiming interpretive authority over the text. These references require knowledge of both the 1939 film and the Wicked musical/film, creating a hierarchy of fan expertise where those who understand the intertextual relationships possess greater cultural capital. This cultural capital also created the hierarchy of "old-gens" and "new gens."

Shipping Culture discourse centers on "Gelphe," the romantic pairing of Glinda and Elphaba, a reading that interprets the characters' relationship as queer despite the presence of heterosexual romance in the narrative. This discourse has roots in slash fiction traditions and contemporary queer reading practices that seek LGBTQ+ representation in mainstream media. The intensity of fan investment in this pairing reflects both genuine emotional connection and ironic acknowledgment of obsessive fan behavior.

Eroticized Fan Affection represents fans' willingness to steer away from norms of appropriate public discourse by explicitly expressing sexual desire for performers and characters. Jonathan Bailey's character Fiyero became a particular focus of this discourse, with fans using hyperbolic language to describe their attraction. This discourse functions simultaneously as genuine expression of desire and as performance of fan identity, demonstrating membership in a community where such expression is normalized and celebrated.

Cross-Platform Intertextuality reveals fans' engagement with discourse communities beyond Wicked fandom. References to "Floptropica" (a fictional nation in stan Twitter culture) and "looksmaxxing" (terminology from male self-improvement communities) demonstrate fans' multilayered identities and their ability to code-switch between different subcultural contexts. This intertextuality also serves a gatekeeping function, as understanding these references requires immersion in multiple online communities simultaneously.

F. Interpretation

The discourse surrounding the Wicked press tour reveals how digital fandoms construct communal identity through the strategic negotiation of identity gaps. Applying Jung and Hecht's (2004) framework, we can identify multiple instances where discrepancies between identity frames generated the productive tension that drove discourse production and identity work.

The most prominent gap evident in the discourse is the Enacted-Communal Gap between the carefully curated celebrity performances during the press tour and the communal identity of the fandom. The studio and performers enacted an identity characterized by earnestness, emotional vulnerability, and professional polish exemplified by Ariana Grande's tearful response to the "holding space" comment. This enacted identity aligned with traditional celebrity promotional practices and the assumption that audiences desire authentic emotional connection with performers.

However, the communal identity of the digital fandom operated according to different norms: irony, playfulness, transgression, and the demonstration of hyper-specific cultural knowledge. When fans remixed the "holding space" moment into memes, they were not rejecting Grande's emotional authenticity but rather asserting that the fandom's relationship to the text operated through different communicative modes than those assumed by official marketing. The gap between earnest celebrity performance and ironic fan response became generative, producing vast quantities of discourse that simultaneously honored the source material and claimed autonomy from it.

Within individual fans, the discourse reveals Personal-Enacted Gaps that fans negotiated through meme participation. Many fans expressed genuine emotional investment in Wicked, its themes of friendship, difference, and resistance resonated deeply. Yet the communal norms of digital fandom privilege ironic detachment and humor over earnest emotional expression. Meme discourse provided a solution to this gap, allowing fans to simultaneously express sincere investment and maintain ironic distance. A fan could post an eroticized comment about Jonathan Bailey while framing it in hyperbolic language that signaled awareness of social transgression, thus enacting both sincere desire and ironic self-awareness.

The Textual Poaching code particularly demonstrates fans' negotiation of Personal-Relational Gaps. By inserting themselves into the narrative through the figure of Dorothy, fans articulated a discrepancy between their own understanding of the Wicked story (informed by extensive knowledge of both texts) and what they perceived as the studio's assumptions about audience knowledge and investment. These posts asserted, "We know more than you think we know, and we interpret this text on our own terms." This negotiation of the gap between self-concept (knowledgeable insider) and perceived external ascription (general audience member) reinforced communal identity by positioning fans as interpretively superior to both casual viewers and marketing professionals.

Shipping Culture discourse reveals how fans managed gaps between the Enacted Identity of the text (where Glinda and Elphaba have an intense but ultimately platonic friendship) and the Communal Identity of the fandom (where queer readings are normalized and celebrated). Rather than accepting the heteronormative framing of the official narrative, fans collectively constructed an alternative interpretive framework where Gelphie was understood as a romantic relationship. This collective reinterpretation functioned as identity work, asserting the fandom's autonomy and its roots in LGBTQ+ cultural traditions.

The Cross-Platform Intertextuality code demonstrates how fans performed multilayered identities by drawing on references from multiple discourse communities simultaneously. A single meme might combine Wicked references with stan Twitter terminology, internet slang, and platform-specific formats, creating a text that required fluency in multiple subcultural languages. This multilayered performance reflected the reality that individual fans belong to numerous overlapping communities, each with its own identity frame. The meme became a site where these multiple identities could be enacted simultaneously, creating what Hecht describes as interpenetration of identity frames.

Ultimately, the discourse surrounding the Wicked press tour demonstrates that meme production is not merely entertainment or commentary but a sophisticated form of identity work. Through memes, fans negotiated the gaps between their self-concepts and the ways they believed others perceived them, between their private emotional investments and their public performances, and between individual identity and collective belonging. The communal identity that emerged from this discourse was characterized by specific markers: hyper-specific cultural knowledge, facility with irony and humor, willingness to transgress norms of appropriate expression, and multilayered engagement with both the source text and broader digital culture.

This communal identity functioned as what Hall (1985) describes as interpellation. By understanding and participating in the discourse, individuals were "hailed" into the collective group. Each meme shared, each reference decoded, each inside joke laughed at served as a ritual of belonging. The identity gaps that generated this discourse were not problems to be solved but productive tensions that enabled fans to continuously renegotiate their individual and collective identities in relation to the text, the performers, one another, and the broader culture.

CONCLUSION

This paper examined how digital fandoms construct communal identity through meme discourse, using the Wicked press tour as a case study. By applying Jung and Hecht's (2004) Communication Theory of Identity and Schneider's (2013) discourse analysis methodology, the research demonstrates that meme production functions as a sophisticated communicative practice through which fans negotiate identity gaps and establish collective belonging.

The analysis reveals a distinct Enacted-Communal identity gap between the earnest, professionally curated celebrity performances and the ironic, playful discourse of the digital fandom. Through systematic coding, five primary discursive strategies emerged: Diva Worship, Textual Poaching, Shipping Culture, Eroticized Fan Affection, and Cross-Platform Intertextuality. Each strategy represents a mode of negotiating identity gaps while constructing communal identity markers characterized by hyper-specific cultural knowledge, facility with irony, willingness to transgress norms, and multilayered engagement with source material and digital culture.

The findings support CTI's fundamental premise that identity is inherently communicative and constructed through social interaction. Identity gaps are not deficiencies to be resolved but productive tensions that generate discourse and enable continuous identity negotiation. As Boyd (2010) theorizes, the affordances of networked publics amplify these communicative processes, allowing fans to construct and perform identity at unprecedented scale.

This paper demonstrates how meme discourse operates as interpellation (Hall, 1985) by understanding and participating in shared jokes and references, individuals are "hailed" into collective identity. Each meme shared and decoded serves as a ritual of belonging that transforms passive media consumption into active identity construction. The Wicked press tour discourse shows that in contemporary digital culture, audiences assert interpretive autonomy and construct communal belonging through participatory discourse, with communal identity existing not despite identity gaps but because of them.

REFERENCES

- Boyd, D. (2010). Social Network Sites as Networked Publics: Affordances, Dynamics, and Implications. (2010). In A Networked Self (pp. 47–66).
<https://doi.org/10.4324/9780203876527-8>
- Di Placido, D. (2024, November 30). ‘Wicked’—Ariana Grande and Cynthia Erivo’s ‘Holding Space’ meme, explained. Forbes.
<https://www.forbes.com/sites/danidiplacido/2024/11/26/wicked-ariana-grande-and-cynthia-erivos-holding-space-meme-explained/>
- Hall, S. (1996). Who needs 'identity'?
https://pages.mtu.edu/~jdslack/readings/CSReadings/Hall_Who_Needs_Identity.pdf
- Jenkins, H. (1992). Textual poachers : television fans & participatory culture. In Medical Entomology and Zoology. <http://ci.nii.ac.jp/ncid/BB11273072>
- Jung, E., & Hecht, M. L. (2004). Elaborating the communication theory of identity: Identity gaps and communication outcomes. Communication Quarterly, 52(3), 265-283.
<https://doi.org/10.1080/01463370409370197>
- Schneider, F. (2013). How to do a discourse analysis.
- Shifman, L. (2013). Memes in digital culture. In The MIT Press eBooks.
<https://doi.org/10.7551/mitpress/9429.001.0001>

APPENDIX

Netizen Memes and Commentary

A.

Figure A. Review by kats (2024) on Letterboxd
(<https://letterboxd.com/cloudlatte/film/wicked-2024/>)

B.

Figure B. Post, by kev [@kehvuhn] (2024) on X
(<https://x.com/kehvuhn/status/1860105890411741418>)

C.

Figure C. Short clip by zoloftsquaddddd [@freakkville] (2025)on Tiktok (<https://www.tiktok.com/@zoloftsquaddddd/video/7587132173799394590>)

D.

Figure D. Commentary by Rynn (2025)on Tiktok (https://www.tiktok.com/@mmmmnnnyeah/video/7571393229988449556?is_from_webapp&sender_device=pc&web_id=7430799830047475208)

E.

Figure E. Post by Tim Popp [@popphits] (2025) on X (<https://x.com/popphits/status/1991558834679345316>)

F.

Figure F. Post by it's over [@agusthirai] (2025) on X (<https://x.com/agusthirai/status/1992312888216965165>)

G.

Figure G. Short reel by beltagiiii (2025) on Instagram
(<https://www.instagram.com/p/DRbtyXHjLJk/>)

H.

Figure H. Community post by lei [@shemoonliight] (2025) on X
(<https://x.com/shemoonliight/status/1878454382292828487>)

I.

Figure I. Short clip by maeevanss (2025) on Tiktok
(https://www.tiktok.com/@maeevanss/video/7575343090068704534?is_from_webapp=1&sender_device=pc&web_id=7430799830047475208)

J.

Figure J. Short clip by vianna.king (2025) on Tiktok
(https://www.tiktok.com/@vianna.king/video/7467608992311692575?is_from_webapp=1&sender_device=pc&web_id=7430799830047475208)

K.

Figure K. Commentary by victor (2024) on Tiktok
(<https://vt.tiktok.com/ZSHK4bVpqhJaY-6vbN7/>)

L.

Figure L. Commentary by hogwartsnerd101 (2025) on Tiktok.
(<https://vt.tiktok.com/ZSHK4bKc3l4ak-NvT9z/>)

M.

ahri.

she probably like "ain't they supposed to be enemies?" 🤔🤔🤔

11-22

Reply

♡ 4,733

Figure M. Commentary by ahri. (2025), on Tiktok
(<https://vt.tiktok.com/ZSHK4gNDMrFsr-zfljz/>)